

THE GAME

The Hamilton University Wolfriding team is a college-level wolfriding team based in Washington DC. Wolfriding is a co-ed sport which combines elements of ice hockey, lacrosse, and dogsledding. The game takes place on an ice rink which is piled up with strategically placed snow drifts. Most players skate on the ice, weaving between the snowdrifts and passing the ball to teammates with lacrosse-like sticks.

The court has two goals, guarded by a goalie on each team. One player per team plays the position of Wolfrider, and rides on the back of a wolf-husky hybrid, which is genetically engineered to be large enough to carry a small adult. These hybrids have the tameable nature of huskies and the strength of wolves.

This player jumps from snowdrift to snowdrift, and primarily assists on offensive plays. However, the wolfdog and its rider can engage in both offensive and defensive plays. This player also carries a netted stick•

Hamilton University is a medium-sized public university of about 20,000 students. Their Wolfriding team was established 20 years ago, and grew out of the popular club team at the school. The team has been established for two decades and is a strong competitor in the Eastern Division. It already has significant community support which it hopes to maintain and grow. They want to portray an image of strength, unity, and to show that they care about their community. Hamilton University is a medium-sized public university of about 20,000 students.
